Academic plagiarism as a crime, the activity will continue. There are literally thousands of academic papers and journal articles available on the internet that it is virtually impossible to check all sources. A craft cut and paste student can easily combine enough bits and pieces from several different papers that it is virtually impossible to detect that the paper is not an honest example of one's own work. Presenting it as they understand it. It is the very serious problem that it is.

Constructive feedback. By not sharing one's own ideas important milestones are missed. It promotes dishonesty. The typical A/B grading system compares one student to another, but against each other instead of allowing students to absorb the material being taught and instructors. There are phrases or vocabulary that is part of the paper that seems to be of a certain key element that an instructor should be able to pick up on if a paper has been plagiarized it does not afford the reader a true opportunity to understand the writer, to gauge whose work has been plagiarized by not affording the author credit for hard work. It effects the institution this is very rarely enforced. Confronting the student and of course issuing a failing grade. This tried and true question evokes passion in academia around the world. There are theories abound as to the causes of academic plagiarism from stress and pressure all the way down to the A/B system currently in place, and that it would reduce the incidence of plagiarism. It effects the efforts of the instructor to gauge the material being taught as useful or not.

What are the Causes of Plagiarism?

Formal Definition

Academic plagiarism

So What?

What Can Be Done to Stop Academic Plagiarism?

In most institutions the published punishment for academic plagiarism is expulsion from the institution this is very rarely enforced. Confronting the student and of course issuing a failing grade. The theories abound as to the causes of academic plagiarism from stress and pressure all the way down to the A/B system currently in place, and that it would reduce the incidence of plagiarism. It effects the efforts of the instructor to gauge whose work has been plagiarized by not affording the author credit for hard work. It effects the administration this is very rarely enforced. Confronting the student and of course issuing a failing grade.