As self-criticism by itself isn't bad, it makes sense to balance it out rather than eliminate it completely and lose out on its good aspects. There is an important difference between beating yourself up and being productively honest about your shortcomings. Striking a balance would enable you to make productive use of constructive criticism, while staying away from its destructive counterpart.

Recognize the Context
If a girls' night out made you binge drink and go on a self-criticism spree, when you woke up with a hangover the next morning, it's important that you recognize the context instead of putting the blame only on yourself.

What were the factors that lead you to do it? Was there peer pressure? Were you having too much fun? Was there a 'who can drink the most' competition? Once you recognize what your triggers are, you would empower yourself, by gaining knowledge of what you need to work on, or even avoid.